My site have lets say 100,000 users, and even more will follow. I want to know is php's output buffering an effective way to send large pages quickly? I heard it uses memory and my server's memory is already limited. Are there any notable drawbacks? A: PHP's output buffering is not an effective way to send data quickly. It uses memory. You are probably running out of memory because you are only outputting one page at a time. Writing to an intermediate store like a database may be a better solution. If you are using a generic database, it may also require some work (for example by avoiding flushing intermediate data to disk if they are not really needed). It requires more planning and maintenance, but it could give you some advantages that output buffering doesn't provide.
