GitHub Notifier Description: As a GitHub user, you might know just how easy it is to miss notifications, especially if your attention is required elsewhere. With its self-explanatory name, GitHub Notifier aims to bring these updates out in the open in the form of native Chrome notifications. Some reasons why this tool is worth your attention One of the highlights of this extension is, of course, the fact that it also works when Chrome is closed. That said, if configured properly, the extension is capable of bringing notifications to your computer's desktop regarding pull requests, new issues, or new "cut" releases. It's also worth pointing out that it comes with support for both public and private repositories and that it does not require any API or personal token to work. The extension makes it possible for you to effortlessly open the pull requests, issues, or releases by simply clicking their associated notifications tabs. Straightforward extensions that should keep you updated with the latest updates on various GitHub repositories of your choosing It smoothly integrates with Chrome's toolbar, it boasts a compact, functional, yet not particularly stylish user interface, and it can be deployed on Chrome browsers with the typical one-click-ADD-TO-CHROME action from the Chrome Web Store. As we're sure you'll discover soon enough, you can "follow" multiple GitHub projects at once. To get started, simply add the organization or GitHub username and the repo's exact name in the designated areas; not the full GitHub URL, mind you. Before you hit the SAVE button from the lower part of the UI, please note that you can set the refresh rate to any value above 180 seconds, and that's basically that. Useful Chrome extension for active GitHub users Having said all that, if Google Chrome is your browser of choice and you're looking for one of the simplest ways of staying in tune with all your GitHub notifications, then you should definitely give this extension a quick spin to see what's what. How to use: Open extension page. Click "Add Repository" and add the GitHub username of the repository. Click "Add Project" and add the project name of the repository. Click "Save" and you're
